UK Outlook for Tuesday 16 Mar 2021 to Thursday 25 Mar 2021:
At the start of this period, the weather is likely to begin settling down with high pressure building from the southwest. Temperatures will likely be near or a little above average at first, but chilly at night with rural frost. Southern and western areas are likely to see primarily settled conditions, with a good deal of dry weather, though some rain remains possible at times. However, there is more uncertainty across northern and eastern areas, where spells of rain, showers and stronger winds are more likely, though still with some reasonable drier interludes. Some morning fog patches are likely to develop in the settled regime, most likely in the southwest. There is much uncertainty in temperatures for this period, but likely to see above average temperatures for a time.
